

Court upholds McMaster University's COVID exemption request process

What you need to know

- In Michalski v. McMaster University, the Ontario Divisional Court dismissed an application for judicial review of four McMaster University decisions regarding creed-based exemption requests from its COVID-19 vaccination policy.
- In the decision, the court emphasized that the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario (HRTO) is the appropriate place to decide on these matters.
- The court also found that McMaster's process for addressing accommodation and exemption requests gave applicants the necessary procedural fairness.
- This finding suggests that similar employer processes will satisfy the procedural fairness requirement.

Background

As Ontario considered a return to in-person learning, McMaster developed a COVID-19 vaccination policy requiring all faculty, staff, and students who attended university property to be fully vaccinated against COVID-19. Alternatively, individuals could request exemptions based on a protected ground under the Human Rights Code (the Code).

Anticipating a high volume of exemption requests, McMaster developed an internal review process to assess submissions to determine whether the applicant had a valid reason for exemption under the Code. The university would accommodate valid requests, while those denied meant the applicant could no longer study on campus.

McMaster assembled a validation team and provided them a guideline outlining the criteria to assess creed-based submissions. Literature from the Human Rights Commission informed the guideline.

The four applicants were Christian undergraduate and graduate students requesting exemptions based on their religious beliefs. McMaster denied their exemption requests and the applicants went to the Divisional Court to try to defeat the university's decision.

Decision

In a unanimous decision, the Divisional Court dismissed the application and declined to exercise its discretion to judicially review the university's decisions.

The court held that the applicants were asking the court to decide whether the university's validation team correctly interpreted the meaning of "creed" under the Code. As a result, the court ruled that the HRTA was the appropriate place to adjudicate the applicants' claims.

Although the court declined to review the university's decisions, it made several helpful observations regarding the duty of procedural fairness owed to the applicants for processing their exemption requests.

The court noted that the duty of procedural fairness is variable and context-specific and is informed by these factors:

- The nature of the decision being made and the process followed in making it;
- The nature of the statutory scheme and the terms of the statute pursuant to which the body operates;
- The importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected;
- The legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision; and
- The choices of procedure made by the agency itself.

What this means for employers

While the court declined to conduct judicial review in this matter, its decision in Michalski v. McMaster University offers several helpful takeaways for institutions and employers alike:

- In declining to exercise its discretion to judicially review the university's exemption request decisions, the court has sent a strong signal to future applicants that the HRTA is the appropriate place to challenge the denial of COVID-19 vaccination exemption requests.
- Organizations with similar COVID-19 vaccination policies should ensure their review process includes basic procedural requirements, such as giving individuals an opportunity to make their case and ensuring an impartial decision-maker considers the requests fairly. Where an exemption request is denied, the applicant should be told why.
- Importantly, the Divisional Court did not rule on the reasonableness of the university's policy or its authority to implement it. It also did not indicate the merits of the requests or whether McMaster's denial was discriminatory. It remains to be seen how the HRTA will assess the difficult issues associated with such claims.
